Murder records spreading to more big cities, suburbs

By Tom Squitieri
USA TODAY

The USA rings in the New Year with what's becoming an annual tradition: the setting of record murder rates.

With two days left in the bloodiest year ever, at least 23 big cities beat records — some for the third straight year.

Eight other major cities are on the verge of joining that list.

Tracking a surge in murders that began in 1989, the final murder estimate for 1991 is 17,337 from 1990.

Experts see no leveling off until the end of the decade.

"This is not a problem in one neighborhood or one segment of the city. It's the whole city," says police chief Bill Rathburn of Dallas, which set a record.

USA TODAY's survey shows:

- Medium-size cities once thought immune from the murder terror of the Gothams are setting their own records.
- Killing has seeped into the suburbs. One example: 6 of 7 Washington, D.C., suburbs set records this year, the seventh

Disputes among friends or family members remain a top cause, followed by the drug trade and rising gang activity — all fueled by easy access to firearms, historically used in 3 of every 5 murders.

Experts agree that drug violence has cheapened life.

"We are going to have to work a little harder to convince people that life is worth living," says police chief Johnnie Johnson of Birmingham, Ala. — another city that set a record.

THE DAY AMERICA

3. Americans are making up their own rules, their own laws. In effect, we're all making up our own moral codes. Only 13 percent of us believe in all of the Ten Commandments. Forty percent of us believe in five of the Ten Commandments. We choose which laws of God we believe in. There is absolutely no moral consensus in this country as there was in the 1950s, when all our institutions commanded more respect. Today, there is very little respect for the law—for any kind of law. (See Chapter 1.)

THE DAY AMERICA

In the 1950s and even in the early 1960s, there was something much closer to a moral consensus in America. It was mirrored in a parade of moralizing family TV programs: Ozzie and Harriet, Father Knows Best, Donna Reed, Leave It to Beaver, and even Bonanza.

There is absolutely no moral consensus at all in the 1990s.

Everyone is making up their own personal moral codes—their own Ten Commandments.
